This question seems very easy for some parents with children who already suffer from mental retardation, developmental delay, speech difficulties and intellectual disabilities, and who are unaware that there are alternative, safe, scientific approaches available. If a parent is convinced that his or her child does not have autism based on this premise or on other evidence in the family or child's family, there seems to be a real problem that can be cured. A parent whose child has an intellectual disability is more likely to benefit from a more thorough research program. Many researchers would probably disagree. But there are other explanations that I suspect the parents of these children might never find out. Some of these explanations come from the same scientific sources, such as genetics, early childhood development and developmental disorders in the adult. For example, as we already know from the above reasons, parents who are genetically predisposed to autism can actually gain a lifelong advantage when they receive intensive support and education in their child's area of learning and development in an autism-specific setting.. I have a simple question for all concerned parents who are facing difficult medical issues involving children: Are you going to write or let your doctor and staff diagnose a child with autism using conventional approaches or, in the case of children with known autism spectrum disorder, are you going to take measures that might prevent the child from having autism?..
